When San Marco ruled, we had dinner and supper

Under French rule, nice people, we had only dinner.

Under Lorena rule, no dinner, no supper.

Under Italian rule, we dreamed of eating, they brought us a damn famine.

INTRODUCTION

Millions of tourists visit Venice each year, fascinated by its beauty and artistic charm. It is a romantic town that reminds us of Vivaldi's music, Palladio's architecture, Casanova's writings, and series of incredible painters such as Titian, Carpaccio, Canaletto, Giorgione, Tiepolo, Veronese and Tintoretto. But have you ever wondered what kind of people (and with what resources) would think of building such a fantastic city in the middle of a lagoon? Who were the magnates that could afford the most expensive musicians and painters, and throw the most extravagant Carnival parties of the Renaissance?

Ahead of being artists, Venetians were clever and skilled merchants, among the most astute and entrepreneurial the Mediterranean has ever seen. Prior to the discovery of the New World, Venice basically controlled most trade routes between Europe and the Middle East. It had a monopoly on the Adriatic, it owned Crete, Cyprus and several other Greek islands. As a sign of their commercial influence, in the 1500s Venetian was the language of European diplomacy. It gave to the world the word ciao (short for sciao sóo, meaning 'at your service'). Venetians were always in search of new markets and opportunities. Today the most famous and symbolic Venetian merchant is Marco Polo, who ventured all the way to China. But he definitely was not the only one nor the first to extend Venetian trade through the silk road. The Venetian Republic lasted unconquered for 1100 years until 1797, when Napoleon pillaged it. Its monuments, churches, and paintings that are nowadays relentlessly captured by tourists' flashlights are not just a reminder of the peak of Renaissance's art, but are also the ultimate product of an ancient commercial wisdom.

But where did all this business know-how come from? Venetian commercial success is partly explained by its geographic position. Located in the Northern shores of the Adriatic Sea, this is the farthest North the Mediterranean extends. Before trains, planes and automobiles, water routes were the favored commercial channels. Pirating and sea storms aside, sailing required no infrastructure and avoided hundreds of checkpoints (and thousands of brigands) in an age of fragmented sovereign territories. So it is no surprise that the farthest North reaches of the Mediterranean were a vibrant place for commerce. This is also where rivers flowing from the Dolomites ended in a delta of lagoons and marshes. Through these river routes, trade extended beyond the Alps, into the heart of Europe, all the way to the Baltic Sea. So, centuries before Venice was founded, the once called Venetia Regio was a crossroad for river and sea merchants. This is where the ancient Venet population once prospered since at least 1000 B.C. They were known for trading amber coming from the Baltic Sea and distributing it around Mediterranean ports. They were at home in the Greek world as they participated in the ancient Olympic games. They had a vibrant metallurgic industry as well as prolific pottery production. The descendants of these same people founded Venice centuries later, inheriting not just the name, but certainly also a knack for trade.

And where did all this commercial talent go? The decades after the French Revolution and Napoleon's invasion brought an economic downturn. Soon after the now defunct Venetian Republic became a peripheral region of the Austrian empire, deprived of the international trade that once made it Europe's dominant commercial power. Decades later Austria lost the Venetian territories during the 1866 Austro-Prussian war. They were passed to the Italian Kingdom as war booty, because of Italy's alliance with Prussia. While European countries on the Atlantic prospered thanks to their colonies and industrialization, Venice's annexation to the Italian Kingdom brought further depression. As much as one quarter of the Venet population (about one million people) migrated to the Americas to escape famine. The first half of the twentieth century brought little relief. One of the bloodiest battlefronts in World War One was fought on the Dolomites, once the Northern boundaries of the Venetian Republic. Then came Fascism with its battles in the Balkans, Africa, and World War Two. A century and a half after losing its independence, in 1950s Venetia was considered the poorest region in Western Europe, triggering further migrations to Canada, Australia and Northern Europe.

To everyone's surprise, today Venetia is again one of the richest regions in Europe. In just five decades of peace and free commerce, Venet ingenuity sprouted once again. Even though geographic location and maritime commerce pose no particular advantage in the modern global economy, today's Venets managed to put to work the merchant savvy of their forefathers. The mainland outside Venice is now scattered by self-made men. There are well-known success stories, like Benetton, Stefanel and Diesel in clothing, or Diadora and Lotto in shoes, or Illy in coffee, Aprilia in motorcycles, and so on. But there are many more at the top of less-known industrial sectors, in furniture, high precision tools, hydraulics, valves, electronics.

It is estimated that the former territories of the Venetian Republic, extending from Bergamo in the West to Trieste in the East (including cities like Verona, Vicenza, Padua and Treviso) constitute about 28% of the Italian economy. This means that with about eight million people its GDP is roughly $500 billions. That would make the Venetian Republic the 17th largest economy in the world, well ahead of countries like Switzerland, Belgium, Sweden, Austria, Norway, Denmark, Ireland, South Africa, Argentina and Israel.

Can we bottle all this money-making savvy?
Businessmen are well known to be people of few words. They are not eloquent as journalists or authors, they speak only when necessary, but when they do they have the gift of expressing with one simple phrase the wisdom of years of experience. Recently a lot has been written about the so called economic “Venetian Miracle”, explaining how with absolute no government help so many flourishing small and medium enterprises sprouted in such a short time. But perhaps there is no better way of capturing the essence of this success by listening to the Yogi Berra type quotes spoken in the business world.

Raffaele Serafini belongs to the new generations of Venetian entrepreneurs. While the previous generation laid the foundations, setting up shop in the middle of farmland, the current generation went global, first expanding production in Eastern Europe and now, like modern-day Marco Polo's, they are conquering Asia. Living in Marostica, in the heart of Venetia, Serafini grew up right in the middle of this economic boom. He listened to the concise wisdom of his peer in the business world, and bottled this merchant savvy for the rest of us to savor and enjoy.
